

In response to new data regarding the prevalence of food and housing insecurity among college students, many post-secondary institutions are developing services to help students address basic needs, such as food pantries, benefits counseling, and financial literacy support. A significant barrier to access to these types of services, however, can be the stigma often associated with accessing basic needs resources and this concern can make students reluctant to engage with available support.

JBAY will be hosting a webinar on Thursday, September 27 from 2-3 p.m. that will offer examples of ways in which colleges are structuring their services to encourage student access and reduce the potential that shame or embarrassment is preventing students from accessing available benefits.
